

Will Congress ever learn its budget lessons?

DENNIS VAN ROEKEL

Guest commentary

Will Congress ever get its act together? That question is likely on the minds of many Americans, but this latest impasse should actually serve as a reminder that we need to redouble our efforts to make sure Congress focuses on the right priorities and moves the country forward.

As a former educator, I do not believe in giving up on anyone, even a Congress that always seems to be at loggerheads. Here are a few key budget lessons that Congress should heed.

The first lesson is that our nation can't grow if we don't invest in its people.

The mindless, across-the-board federal budget cuts known as the "sequester" have already hurt many children. And it's only going to get worse — no Band-Aid solutions will heal this wound.

More than half the school districts recently surveyed by the national school superintendents' association reported that they will be reducing the number of staff in our schools in order to compensate for these needless cuts. Of course, it's our children who really miss out because nearly half of the districts will be increasing class size.

Early childhood programs, dropout prevention programs, programs that help children with special needs — the very investments our schools require — have instead been slashed. Any parent or teacher knows that you can't get that time back again. There's no do-over for children who miss out on a good head start in school.

The second lesson is that much of the spending cuts directly result from big corporations and wealthy individuals dodging their fair share of taxes.

In this fall's budget debate, we have a stark choice — do we continue to squeeze ordinary Americans until they can no longer breathe or do we invest in America again, demanding that corporations and their top leaders contribute to America's prosperity and start living by the same rules as the rest of us?

The trade-offs can be startlingly clear. The sequester cuts to elementary and secondary education, which hit low-income kids and those with special learning challenges particularly hard, cost $1.7 billion this year.

That's the same value of the tax break we gave to hedge fund managers that allowed them to cut their tax rate in half. How does that help America grow?

Another example: Head Start — the successful, federally funded preschool program that gets low-income children healthy and ready to learn — has dropped roughly 57,000 children this year because of the sequester. Restoring those slots would cost about $400 million, nearly all of which ($370 million) could be raised by ending the special tax treatment enjoyed by the owners of private jets.

It's a simple matter of priorities. By pushing for deep cuts and causing uncertainty and frustration in the nation's schools, the unmistakable legacy of some members of Congress will be that they chose cutbacks over jobs, politics over compromise and the status quo over investment and future innovation.

Thankfully, some members of Congress are paying attention. U.S. Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.) has introduced the Stop Tax Haven Abuse Act, which would close many of the gaping loopholes that allow corporations to dodge taxes by hiding profits and shipping jobs overseas.

The proposed law would raise an estimated $220 billion over 10 years to replace the sequester cuts, curb the offshoring of jobs and level the playing field for small businesses trying to compete with big corporations. Passing this legislation would help make unnecessary further disastrous cuts to federal funds for education.

Federal budget battles have raged for three years now, frustrating just about every American. As a math teacher, I'd like to see Congress prove its basic math proficiency.

It's time to acknowledge that ordinary Americans can't be squeezed any further. America does better when we all do better. We need to protect middle-class priorities and close loopholes and special tax breaks for Big Business and the wealthy so our nation can make a strong recovery.

Van Roekel is president of the National Education Association, which represents more than 3 million public school employees.